After decades of famine and political __1__ in China, parents who grew up in troubled and often violent times under Mao, suffering long periods of __2__ in the countryside and interrupted schooling, are now rearing- in many cases __3__ on- a generation of only children.

And these new parents are filled with __4__ about whether they are doing it right.

"This is a fixation," said James L. Watson, an anthropologist at Harvard University who has studied the Chinese family. "I would call it kind of a __5__ complex. The generation of parents that we are dealing with now, many of them are Cultural Revolution veterans who themselves did not have __6__ of a childhood, and I think many of them are trying hard to make sure that their own children get all the benefits and more that they missed out on."

But they are doing it with __7__ cultural guidance. The current generation of parents has been cut adrift from both the traditional Confucian values emphasizing __8__ for elders that were once the foundation of China's extended families and from the Communist values __9__ for three decades under Mao.

Neither had much __10__ in China today.

Successful managers are the ones who anticipate and adjust to changing circumstances rather than being passively swept along or caught unprepared. Employers today are hiring managers who can take unfamiliar situations in stride. Successful managers doing business in the twenty-first century will need to be able to adjust to five overarching sources of change: globalization, the evolution of product quality, environmentalism, an ethical reawakening, and the internet revolution.

11. Successful managers will do all of the following except

- A. be always ready for a changing world.
B. be ready to adjust to globalization.
C. follow current management methods.
D. respond to environmental challenges.

The alarm stage is the body's first stage of response to a stressor, during which its defenses prepare for action. Suppose a car ahead of you on the road suddenly veers out of control. This is an immediate stressful event. Your heart starts pounding faster, speeding the flow of blood to your extremities and providing muscles with the oxygen and fuel they need to take swift action, such as performing an emergency maneuver to avoid a collision. The body's response during the alarm stage is called fight-or-flight response because it is characterized by biological changes that prepare the body to deal with a threat by either fighting it off or fleeing from it.

12. According to this paragraph, which of the following is an example of a response during the alarm stage?

- A. Adjusting to the pressures of work
B. Running away from a wild animal
