Sometimes the rules of etiquette seem to be bothersome, but they are designed to make social relations pleasant. Etiquette is merely acting like a well-bred human being should act. However, the meaning behind some polite customs is not always apparent at first glance. The customs of saluting, for example, stems from the days when knights wore armor. Their helmets covered their faces to such an extent that it was impossible to recognize even one’s best friend. Therefore, it became customary for knights to identify themselves by lifting the visors of their helmets. Nowadays, the average soldier does not wear a visor, but he still preserves this old medieval custom by saluting.

Shaking hands is another polite custom with an old history. During the Middle Ages, it was very dangerous to travel because of the large number of robbers that lurked around the roads. Therefore, when two travelers met, they commonly extended their hands to show that they carried no weapons. Today, the handshake is merely a sign of our good will and sincerity, but we also express our friendliness by various greetings. Such expressions, as “How are you?” and “I hope you’re feeling well” are designed to express our interest in the welfare of others. Even the word goodbye is a shortened form of “God be with ye.” Such expressions stem from man’s desire to be friendly and polite.

The old saying “When in Rome do as the Romans do.” is never more true than when at the dinner table. In some parts of Japan, it is a sign of appreciation to drink one’s tea or soup with much gusto and smacking lips. But in most Western countries no noise should be made while eating. Eating utensils, too, differ from country to country. The Japanese use chopsticks, while Western people usually employ the knife and fork. Even the manner of holding a knife and fork, however, varies from country to country, and it is certainly wise to make a little preliminary study of eating habits before traveling to a foreign country. This precaution can save travelers a lot of embarrassment.
